Does C# have something similar? A: No, there is no such method in the Framework. Even in the Thread class, there is no Sleep but a ConfigureAwait(false) to block the execution of the current thread while waiting for the result to be available. In C#, you usually create Task objects to represent operations that may take some time to be executed. You can use them as a result: var task = Task.Run(() => DoSomething()); or as a continuation: var task = DoSomethingAsync(); var result = await task; To simulate Thread.Sleep, in C# you have two choices: Use the Stopwatch class to simulate the action of the native method Time. Wait until the Task object completes: Task task = DoSomethingAsync(); ... var result = await task; var elapsedTime = task.Wait(TimeSpan.FromSeconds(5)); You can use the Task.Delay method for a relative delay in execution time: Task task = DoSomethingAsync(); ... var result = await task.Delay(TimeSpan.FromSeconds(5)); The first method is the most "native", but depending on the platform you're programming for, you may have platform-specific options. In.NET, if you are programming with.NET 4.5, then use async/await and have an await for the Task object: Task task = DoSomethingAsync(); ... var 648931e174

Patients are generally referred to centers of cardiothoracic surgery for surgical repair of selected forms of cyanotic congenital heart disease. A thorough understanding of the anatomy of the associated intracardiac defects is essential for anatomic considerations and selection of the ideal management. We describe two cases of systemic-to-pulmonary shunts associated with ventricular septal defect/atrial septal defect. The cases presented are illustrative of the spectrum of cyanotic congenital heart disease and are focused on the anatomic considerations and management of this complex syndromic malformation.The effect of high-frequency extracorporeal shock wave treatment on cryoablation non-response: a prospective randomized study. Cryoablation (CA) is an effective method of treating cardiac arrhythmias. However, about 50% of patients have some kind of non-response (NR). High-frequency extracorporeal shock wave therapy (HFSWT) has been considered in recent years as an adjunctive therapy for the treatment of NR in cardiac arrhythmias. Therefore, the aim of this study was to evaluate the role of HFSWT on CA NR. A total of 40 patients with refractory and intractable supraventricular tachycardias (SVT) were prospectively enrolled in the study. The patients were randomly allocated to either CA without adjunctive therapy (control group) or CA with HFSWT (HFSWT group) for treatment of their arrhythmia. The follow-up period was 2 months. We compared the success rate between the two groups. Regarding acute success, the rate was 100% in the control group and 90% in the HFSWT group; the difference was statistically significant (P
